The californian was outboxed and out-Californian was outboxed and outfought almost all the way by the doughty little man who was defending Attell jabbed Jim's mouth with a left the Union Jack.

The men put up a battle such as of light lefts on the face, then Jim seldom is seen in the squared circle. At times it was a veritable dance of the ear. Driscoll put a left to the ghosts, with both men high up on their toes and flitting like will-o'-the-wisps the wind. The Englishman put a toes and flitting like will-o'-the-wisps about the ring, shooting in jabs with wicked right on Abe's chin and folthe speed of striking serpents. At such times even Attell's masterly tactics could not prevail against the bewildering speed and wonderful footwork of the Briton. Again, the men stood toe to toe and battled like gamecocks, sending in smashes that mashed after a clinch Driscoll sent a left to and mangled as the leather crushed Attell's bad eye. There was another long range, masterly blocking and clever ducking, bulldog battling in clever ducking, bulldog battling in long range. The American landed a left on Abe's chest and lesh and bone. Lightning lunges at close quarters—all the condiments that Driscoll hooked a solid left on Attell's delight the tastes of the hit, stop and nose and followed it with a right on the ear. Attell's left was checked,

The American put up a game fight and never gave an inch of ground. With head down like a cayuse bucking a snow storm, always he battled with face to the front, striving to get in and land the punch that would have sent the Briton to Dreamland. But generally the Englishman kept just out of his reach, circling his adversary and leaping in and out, striking as fiercely and bitterly as a gaunt gray timber wolf snaps when at bay. It was At-tell who did most of the forcing, but Driscoll's game was to get his man coming and that was how he slashed and tore at the Californian. Attell, whose ring generalship and cleverness has made almost all the men in his class in America take to the tall timber, could not fathom the dazzling cleverness of the man from the land of John Bull. While Abe did not qualify for the monkey house respectfully of Orange and Duchess along with Matty Baldwin, Johnny County N.
